Position description

The Gopnik Lab at UC Berkeley seeks a Postdoctoral Scholar to work on a funded project exploring the cognitive, cultural, and philosophical foundations of caregiving. The Postdoctoral Scholar will be expected to contribute to research establishing a general theory of care using methods from developmental psychology and cognitive science. This research will explore how caregiving is understood and represented throughout the lifespan, including care for children but also elders and others, bridging the gap between empirical studies and theoretical frameworks. The selected Postdoctoral Scholar candidate will work with the principal investigator, the research team at Berkeley, as well as collaborators at Harvard and Yale to help achieve the project's goals. The Postdoctoral Scholar will also utilize existing research networks to investigate caregiving from a global and cross-cultural perspective, including the Culture & Ontogeny Research Initiative (CORI), the Shuar Health and Life History Project (SHLHP), and Forager Child Studies (FCS), with the possibility of conducting fieldwork.

Responsibilities include:

- Conduct and design empirical experiments to explore how humans understand caregiving,

- particularly focusing on infants' and children's behavior and their understanding of care.
- Develop and test formal models that capture the unique qualities of care relationships, differentiating them from other social and economic relationships.
 - Collaborate in the development of interdisciplinary frameworks that draw on cognitive economics, psychology, philosophy, and political science to understand caregiving.
 - Participate in ongoing workshops, including those initiated at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences (CASBS), and contribute to publications by writing papers synthesizing the research agenda.
 - Coordinate with interdisciplinary teams to foster synergies between broader theoretical projects and more focused empirical efforts.
 - Prepare research findings for publication and present results at conferences and academic workshops.
 - Contribute to grant applications and project reporting for future funding sources aimed at expanding the research project.
