and public welfare administration, the school now confers undergraduate, master's, and doctoral degrees which prepare its students for careers in social work and social welfare. Berkeley Social Welfare alumni are abundant in the field and well-known for their professional readiness and success. Students have more than 200 local opportunities for field placements as well as summer service-learning experiences that are out-of-region or international. A strong partner and contributor to the field and the community, the school is home to ten distinguished centers, institutes, projects, and labs in which researchers and practitioners leverage their intellect and skills to benefit its students and the people in the surrounding Berkeley community. In addition, the school is deeply connected to many communities in non-profit, scholastic, and governmental agencies, shaping the field in important ways.

Joining the school at a pivotal moment, the next dean has the opportunity to elevate the school's influence and impact by developing an ambitious and exciting strategic vision and plan that advances it across multiple sectors: community partnerships, research, teaching, and preparing its graduates to become agents of social change. The new dean will re-energize philanthropic efforts, advocate for the unique needs of the school, strengthen the social fabric of the community, and ensure support for all faculty, students, and staff.

The ideal candidate for this position should have a strong understanding of both research and praxis, experience in building internal partnerships and external collaborative coalitions with non-profit, community, and/or governmental agencies, and proven success in garnering resources and administering at an institution with complexities similar to the University of California, Berkeley.
